The Police Commissioners on Wednesday night took radical measures to stop the increasing law-lessness. They have practically taken the detective lessness. They have practically taken the detective branch in charge, ordering that only two men are to do detailed duty in citizen's clothes, one in the day and one at night. No officer can be assigned to special duty for a longer period than one month, and the captain was ordered to select his men by the rule of seniority, the mounted squad to be exempt. Detectives Robinson Shea, John Schiebel and Joseph Schiebel were accordingly assigned to post duty, and Patrolman William Carroll was assigned to special duty.

expected that a large measure of relief would be experienced this fall when several new school buildings, for which the money was appropriated by the Strong administration, were completed. So great has been the growth of the city's juvenile population, however, that the pressure has only slightly decreased, and the parents of 15,560 public school children are complaining more or less bit terly that their sons and daughters to-day are reeiving instruction for only half or part of the school term, and a large number of others cannot get into the schools at all.

This state of affairs is particularly burdens in the Borough of Brooklyn. The blame for it cannot justly be placed upon the Board of Educa-tion, it is said. The Commissioners have built all the schools for which the city authorities allowed them money. The Board only a few months ago petitioned the Municipal Assembly for $1,509,000 with which to build or complete school buildings absolutely needed, but as yet the city officials have taken no action upon that request.

A THIEF WITH A CONSCIENCE.

HOW DR. PECK'S COAT WAS STOLEN AND FINALLY GOT BACK TO ITS OWNER.

This is the tale of a thief with a conscience That is, it is presumed that he has one, or the incidents here recorded would probably never have occurred. It is a true story, and one without a moral-two things which should commend it. The story opens in the vestibule of the First Baptist Church, in Mount Vernon, the occasion being a Christian Endeavor mass meeting for the purpose liquer and gambling laws. The time, last Friday Incidentally, it may be added that it was a cold night, with black clouds overhead threatening rain. To the church came some thousand odd good citizens of Mount Vernon. Likewise several ministers, among whom was the Rev. Dr. G. C. Peck. There were also in the assemblage the Chief of Police and the Police Commissioners, attracted thither by an announcement that snapshot pictures would be exhibited, showing certain folk in the act of breaking the law. Thither also came the thief, who for a long time has made it a habit to attend revival and other church meet ings, not for conscience' sake, but with an aim to sacure such booty as is there afforded. Now, this thief, like Robin Hood of old, who was dignified with another title well known in the predatory profession, disdained to rob those who were poor. So he stood in a shadowy corner and waited until Dr. Peck arrived in a nice new brown overcoat, looking the prosperous and contented man. The minister removed his coat and hung it up, whereupon the thief immediately took it and started away. He was not discovered by the Chief of Police or the Commissioners, but after going a short distance that conscience, which is a n inconvenient adjunct in the thieving profession, began to trouble him. He felt the biting air, and looked up at the lowering sky. Then he began to question himself as to whether he had not perhaps walked away with a poor man's coat. That feeling grew upon him, and as he was a sym-pathetic thief he decided to convince himself. He thereupon proceeded to array himself in the garment and returning to the church awaited the breaking up of the meeting in order to see what manner of man made outcry upon discovering the

He stood by the side of the minister when the latter found out his loss and gave voice to his feelings on the subject. Being thus reassured that the loser was not one in need like himself he once more departed. He did not know that in his stay of less than a year in Mount Vernon Dr. Peck had been twice before robbed—once of another nice overcoat and again of a bicycle-or he might have been more charitable. The next scene in the story shifts to the home been more charitable.

The next scene in the story shifts to the home of the Rev. J. Wilbur Chapman, No. 631 West Endaye. To Dr. Chapman comes a sorrowing woman, who tells him that she is wife to a robber. She asks him to use his influence on the man to induce him to mend his ways, and the minister bids her send the erring one to him.

The thief comes. He says that for thirty years he has taken from those whom he thought had more than himself. The world, he argues, owes him a living. Wherein he but echoes the sentiments of men who are not thieves, and yet hold to similar beliefs. He informs the minister that his chief income is derived from revivals and church meetings, and to prove that he is an adept in that line of work he tells of the coat he puriolined in Mount Vernon, and offers to sell it to Dr. Chapman for the small sum of $5.

The hargain, however, is not consummated, and the thief goes on his way. A seed of repentance has been sown, however, and that which he cannot use he is willing to have others enjoy. So, after obtaining $6$ for the coat, he mails Dr. Chapman the pawn ticket. Perhaps he also wishes the minister to know that the coat was cheap at the price, and that he had made a better bargain. Professional pride again!

The ticket finds its way eventually into the hands of Dr. Peck, the owner of the coat, who, after consultation, discovers that he must either pay the pawnbroker or sue on replevin to get his property back. He decides on the former as the simplest and quickest, for cold weather is coming. And now Dr. Peck is once again wearing his nice brown coat.

Dr. Chapman said yesterday that he did not care the saw excepting on the subject, as the man had.

ing. And now Dr. Pecks in the province brown cost.

Dr. Chapman said yesterday that he did not care to say anything on the subject, as the man had come to see him on his invitation, and he did not feel justified in talking about the affair.

SMITH INFIRMARY'S HARVEST FESTIVAL

THE BASEMENT AND MAIN FLOOR STORED WITH GIPTS AND THE ROOMS CROWDED WITH PEOPLE.

The sixth annual harvest home festival at the S. R. Smith Infirmary, Castleton-ave., New-Brighton, Staten Island, took place yesterday. Between five hundred and one thousand people visited the hospital, and were pleased with the success of the affair. The basement was filled to overflowing with gifts, and before the festival was fairly under way it became necessary to utilize several of the rooms and hallways on the main floor for the supplies. The gifts consisted of barrels of flour and vegetables without number, meats, boxes and crates of fancy and staple groceries, cereals in bulk and packages, preserves, toilet articles, surgical sup-plies—everything, in fact, to aid the requirements of a modern and well equipped hospital. Among the most generous donors were the Staten Island school children. F. Hicks, president of the Women's Auxiliary of F. Hicks, president of the world institution, assisted by Mrs. William L. Bones, Mrs. F. U. Johnston, Mrs. H. L. Britton and Mrs. Eugene Du Bois, Mrs. John Lounsbury Randle poured coffee and Mrs. James E. C. Leavitt and Mrs. John Johnson served tea in the reception room. They were assisted by Miss Mary Delehanty, Miss Edith Ransom and Miss Leavitt. In the dining room Mrs. H. T. Knowlton poured tea and Mrs. D. Schnakenberg served coffee. The assistants here were Miss Bessie Davenport, Miss Marjorie Critten, Miss Kate Schnakenberg and Miss Annie Davis. At 4:30 o'clock there were brief exercises, opening with an address by DeWitt Stafford, vice-president of the Board of Trustees, who thanked the friends of the institution. He said that a new building for paid patients was much needed, as there were frequently times when the rooms now devoted to pay patients were occupied. There was devoted to pay patients were occupied. There was a prayer by the Rev. Hobart Clark, pastor of the Unitarian Church, New-Brighton, and an address by the Rev. Dr. John C.
